Alterations in the function of ATM kinase may be the molecular basis of the link between the presence of ATM mutations and the development of cancer. We therefore investigated the involvement of ATM kinase in the induction of apoptosis by gamma-irradiation in the human T-cell line Jurkat. Direct measurement of ATM kinase activity failed to detect an altered function of the ATM kinase upon irradiation. However, the inhibition of ATM kinase activity by wortmannin led to a reduction in apoptosis as judged by flow cytometry with propidium iodide staining, DNA laddering and annexin V binding. These effects were not observed in the presence of both wortmannin and caffeine, an inhibitor of the protein phosphatase (PP)-1. The absence of the effect of wortmannin and caffeine on apoptosis was not due to the expression of the mutated forms of hATM kinase. Taken together, these results provide evidence that ATM-dependent signals are not involved in the induction of apoptosis by ionizing radiation, but suggest that they may be
